

You will need two pieces of fabric shaped like this for each ankle spat.

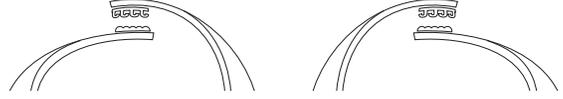

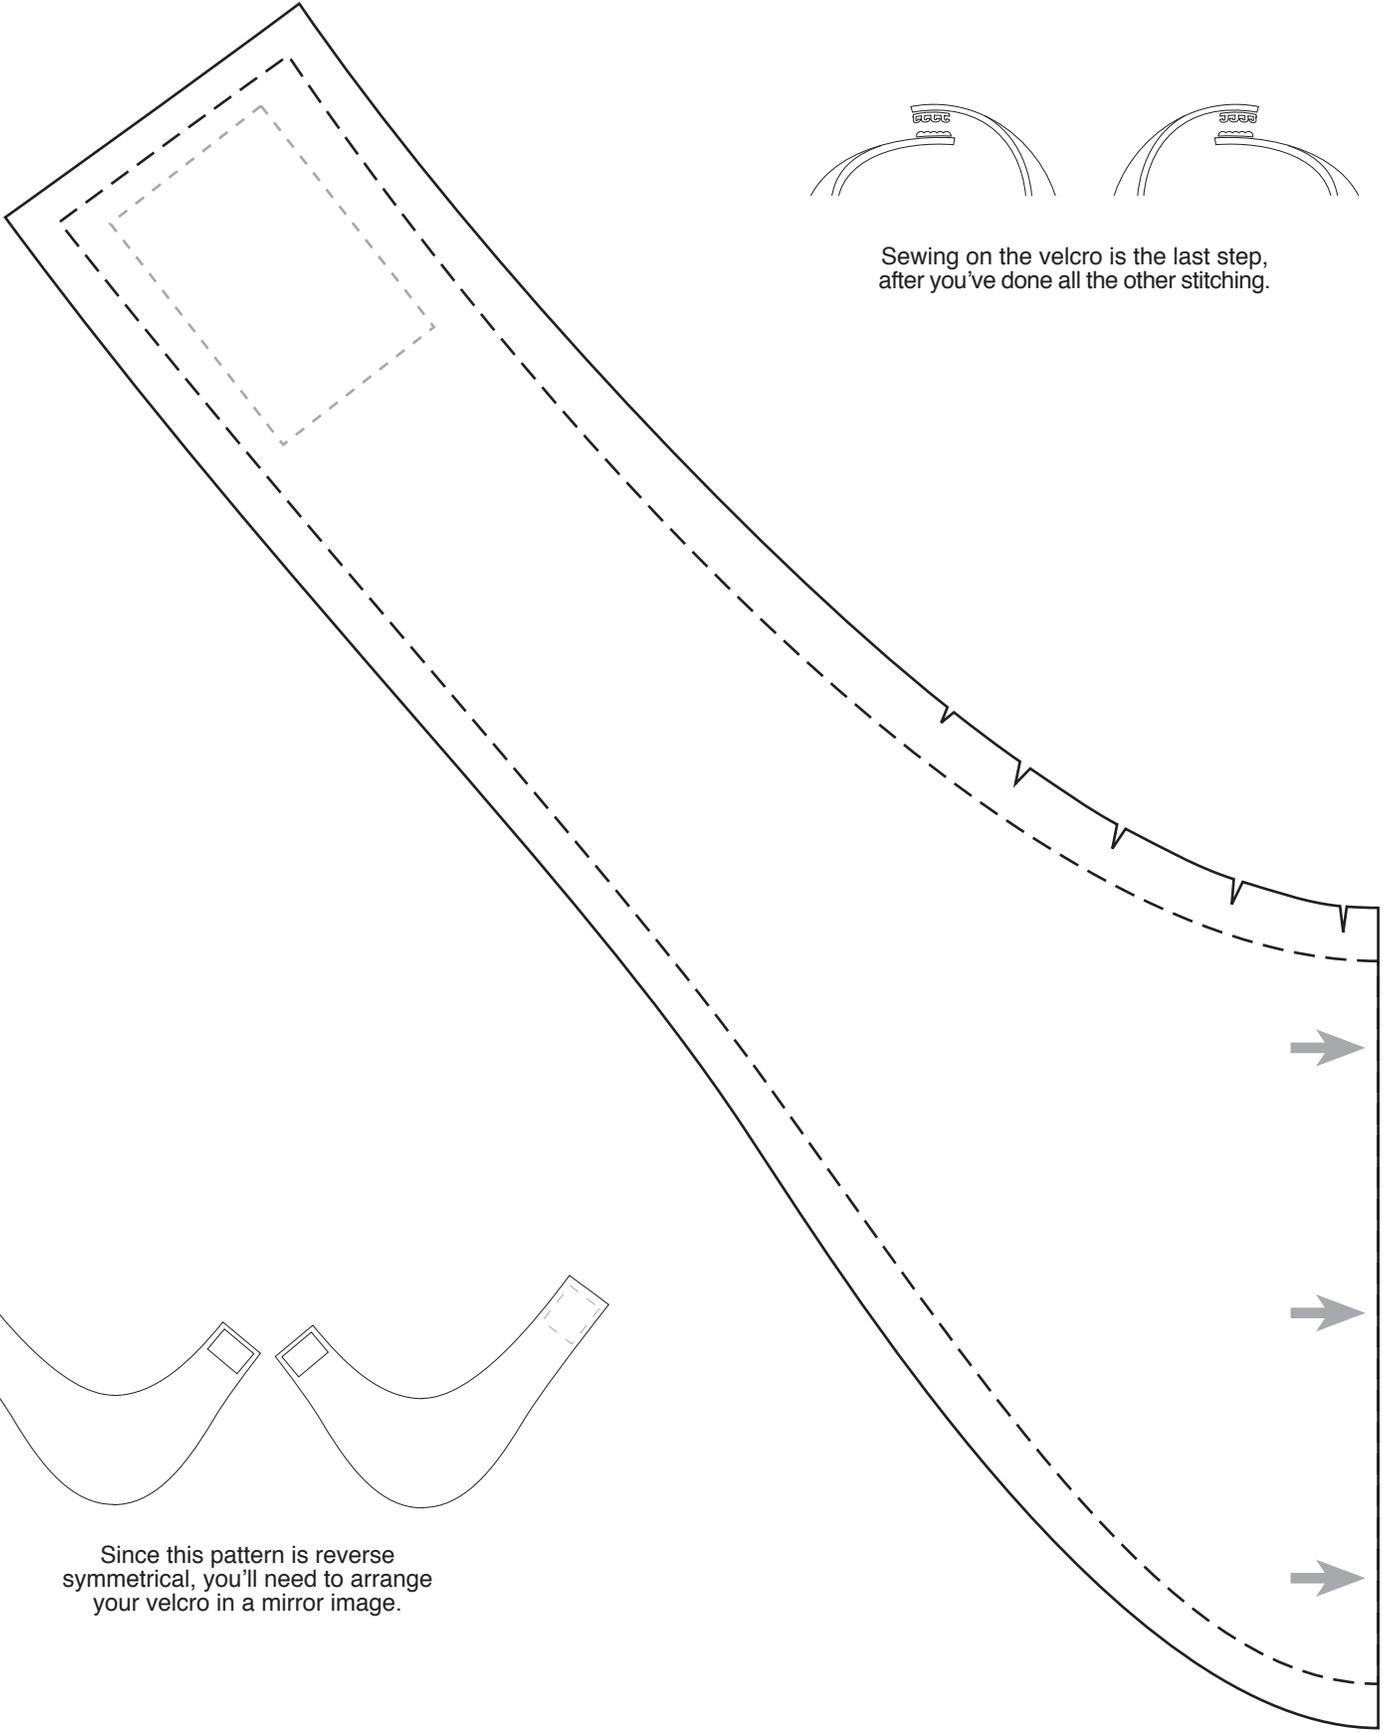

The dotted line shows the actual shape of the spats after they're sewn. The solid line is about how much fabric you'll need to cut out.

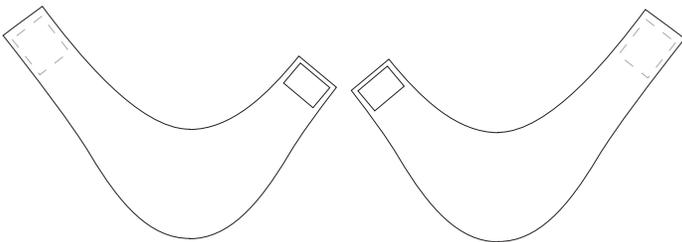

It's probably easier to cut the pattern at the dotted line, trace it onto the fabric, then leave extra around the edge when you're cutting it out. That way, you'll have a nice line to look at when you're stitching or ironing.

If you plan on making more than one set, it's convenient to make a one-piece cardboard template, which is a little more durable when you're tracing around it multiple times.

Sewing on the velcro is the last step, after you've done all the other stitching.

Since this pattern is reverse symmetrical, you'll need to arrange your velcro in a mirror image.
